HOW TO MAKE SOUP

STIMULATING DISH SHOULD PRECEDE ALL DINNERS.

Freshest Meat Should Be Used and With a Reasonable Amount of Care the Result Will Be Satisfying.

Soup is the prelude of the dinner. It is light, healthy, stimulating food that gently prepares the diner for heavier food to come.

The earliest mention of soup that occurs to me is the dish of pottage for which Esau sold his birthright. There can be little doubt that Rebecca was a fine cook, for we know how she made the tempting dish for which he gave his inheritance. Tender pieces of fresh-killed kid were seethed in milk and seasoned with herbs and thickened with meal. This makes a most excellent stew that even these enlightened days have not improved upon.

Indeed, there are but two kinds of soup, thick and thin, or if it please you better, fat and lean. The thick, fat soups comprise bisques, cream soups, purees and mixed soups. The thin soups, or "soup maigres," as the French designate them, are consommé or bouillon and clarified broths.

When making soup use the freshest meat obtainable. Split the bones and cut the meat in small pieces. Put to cook in cold, salted water. This permits the albumen to dissolve before the water commences to boil. This albumen and gelatin rises to the top of the soup kettle, but should not be skimmed off, as much of it will be assimilated in the process of cooking and it contains the richest juices of the meat. After the contents of the soup kettle have commenced boiling briskly, season and add the vegetables and herbs. Keep it boiling slowly and continuously. Thirty minutes to each pound of meat is the usual time allowed, but longer cooking is sometimes necessary. Bisques are the richest and most satisfying of all soups. They originated in 1700 and 1750, and these ancient ones differed greatly from the modern style, which is only a vegetable soup enriched with cream and well thickened. The original bisques well deserve to be resurrected.—Henrietta D. Grauel.

The Angelus.

I've been reading a life of Millet and was struck with his poverty at the time he painted "The Angelus." When one considers how the pictures may now be found in countless homes in this and every country, it seems incredible that Millet had trouble selling the original. All his clients hesitated, until at last a Belgian diplomat was persuaded into buying it. About this time Millet wrote, "We have wood only for one or two days. They will not give it to us without money." Better times were ahead, however, and the wonderful pictures eventually brought Millet at least a living. He is said to have named "The Angelus" in this way: A friend was looking at it for the first time. "What do you think of it?" said Millet. "I hear the bells ringing. It is the Angelus!" was the immediate answer. "It is indeed!" said Millet. "I am contented. You understood it."—New York Press.

Refinement in Trades.

The world as it progresses becomes, if not more refined, at least more delicate in its phrases. A generation ago the dressmaker became a "modiste" and the ready-made tailor's shop a "clothing emporium."

We have to thank America for such improvements as "ready to wear" for ready-made clothes; "footwear" for boots and shoes; "neckwear" for collars and ties and doubtless for many others.—London Mail.
